Plante advocates the theory that the imperfect vacuum of the upper regions, acting like a large conductor, plays the part of the negative electrode in his experiments, while the positive electricity flows towards the planetary spaces, and not towards the ground, through the mists and ice-clouds which float above the Poles. In an article in Nature, March 14, 1878, a further account is given of M. Plante s experiments, under the head of Polar Aurora?; and it is stated that, in these experiments, the electric current, in presence of aqueous vapour, yielded a series of results altogether analogous to the various phases of Polar Aurorae. If the positive electrode of the secondary battery was brought into contact with the sides of a vessel of salt water, there wa observed, according to the distance of the film (electrode 1) from the liquid, either a corona formed of luminous particles arranged in a circle round the electrode (fig. 2, p. 90), an arc bordered with a fringe of brilliant rays (fig. 3), or a sinuous line which rapidly folded and refolded on itself (fig. 4). This undulatory movement, in particular, formed a complete analogy with what had been compared in Aurora? to the undulations of a serpent, or to those of drapery agitated by the wind. The rustling noise accompanying the experiment was analogous to that sometimes said to accompany Aurora?, and was caused by the luminous electric discharge penetrating the moisture. As...
