Then her gentle hands slipped off what remained of wet and torn clothing, they washed the mud from her guest s face and rubbed her cold feet; wine was produced from the cupboard, broth was put down to warm, and then Lodoiska approached with a spoon and offered to feed her. Thou must not move either arm yet, --and Sophie, rejoicing in the sense of rest and security, lay back and submitted to the ministrations of the graceful figure bending over her. The fair Lodolska was a woman a little over thirty, slight, thin, and dark, with a pretty face somewhat marred by traces of smallpox, --far, therefore, from being the divine beauty that her enraptured lover has portrayed her, --but her expression was bright and winning, her voice soft and sweet, and her manner soothing and reassuring. Sophie recalled gradually that Ramond had hinted at something doubtful about her, a marriage in opposition to parents, perhaps, or even an enlevement, --if it had been a divorce or a breach of convent vows, he would have felt no need to apologise, --whatever it was, she was ready to be charitable to it, and to rejoice that the deputy Louvet should be so fortunate in a partner. She knew him by name, and honoured him as the bold leader of the Girondin party in its new position of hostility to Robespierre, though she deplored his tendency as a novelist. And Sophie...
